Top ranked in Ohio and among the top 10 social work schools in the nation, the Mandel School of Applied Social Sciences continues to break new ground in professional education.

The Mandel School offers an innovative combination of extensive field education with the enduring traditions and prestige of a major university. Its alumni are prominent educators, government officials, practitioners, researchers and chief executives of national and regional agencies. Faculty achievements in professional organizations, research and agency consultation further extend the school’s reputation in the advancement of social work practice.
Points of Pride

> The Mandel School was the first school of social work to institute an outcome-based assessment curriculum and remains the only social work school to guarantee a stipend to all full-time master’s students. Students are taught to intentionally use themselves; apply social work methods; integrate social work values and ethics; value a diverse world; think critically; communicate effectively; advocate for social justice; and succeed in the world of work.

> The Louis Stokes Fellowship in Community Development addresses the urgent need for community development leaders by recruiting and supporting working minority professionals in the Master of Science in Social Administration program to help them secure the tools they need to make a real, lasting impact on their communities. The fellowship honors the life work of the retired Northeast Ohio congressman.

> Mandel School students perform more than 224,336 hours of community service and hold more than 260 field placements annually. This is the equivalent of more than $5.25 million in social services added to the economy of Northeast Ohio.

> The Mandel School was named the 2007 recipient of the International Education Award from the Council on Social Work Education and is ranked No. 7 among social work schools in faculty productivity by Academic Analytics. For the last three years the school has been ranked No. 2 in per capita faculty research funding at Case Western Reserve University.

To learn more about supporting students, faculty and research initiatives at the Mandel School of Applied Social Sciences, please contact the Office of Development and External Affairs at 216.368.2311 or visit msass.case.edu.